Subject Leader at Secondary School Goes the Extra Mile with Revision

Subject Leader of Science at The Wellington Academy has gone the extra mile with their revision. With the exam period upon us all the students are busy preparing.

The Wellington Academy has gone the extra mile with revision in preparation for the exams which begin next month. Mrs Taylor-Brown, Subject Leader of Science at the school took it upon herself to transform the toilet mirror into a large revision board. Writing essential formulas and terminology using pictures as reference for the students to read as they wash their hands.

With exam season creeping up on the schools, revision mode is in full swing for all the subjects with each teacher having their own quirky ideas on revision techniques. Exam period is such a stressful time for students and the teachers at The Wellington Academy love to organise fun revision techniques to help try and reduce some of the pressure.

It has been proven that revising should be spread out and students should begin their revision early on. Just as actors wouldn't leave learning their words until the night before, it is more effective to spread out a 10-hour session into multiple sessions, than it is to squeeze it into one night. Testing yourself or teaching someone can also be considered a very effective way of revising as it can teach you to organise your knowledge in a clear and structured manner.

Steven Paddock Headteacher at The Wellington Academy commented “The students loved the idea and were very thankful to Mrs Taylor-Brown for going the extra mile. We want to help our students push themselves to achieve the grades they deserve and the teachers at Wellington Academy are very supportive and have fantastic creative ideas to make revision less of a chore. Our teachers offer additional support sessions for their subjects, we wish all of our students the best of luck in their upcoming exams.”
